gang of confessed murderers confined in any penitentiary in the country.

An enviable record that and one any man ought to be proud of having contributed to.

Meanwhile it will be interesting and instructive to watch the course of action of the non-chalant young man confined in the city jail for the murder of Fassell, the groceryman, once he has decided on the easiest route to the hearts of the class of gullible, fear-ridden gentlemen from which, unfortunately, the juries in local murder cases seem to be selected.

TAFT TOASTED.

"Good morning, Life."

"Why, how are you, Mr. President? Delighted to see you. Sit down."

"Thanks. I came in to ask you how you liked my administration, as far as it has gone."

"Good gracious! What an embarrassing question! Especially as the pleasure of your society is of more consequence than any humble opinion on our part."

"But I really want to know."

"Haven't you yourself stated that you are only a figurehead?"

"Yes—"

"But, my dear Life, that doesn't answer my question. To be an ideal figurehead may be just what is wanted in a President."

"Oh, yes, I realize that. Still, you know, it can be carried too far. You can rub it in."

"And you think—"

"I refuse to think about it, Mr. Taft. Since the last administration, I am only just beginning to recover consciousness."

"Now, Life, that's only your little joke. Be serious and tell me honestly what you think of me."

"I think you are an awfully nice man."

"What are you trying to do—insult me?"

"Well, then, I think you are an honest man."

"Worse and worse. Can't you give me a real opinion?"

"I might, Mr. Taft, if I knew what you had really accomplished."

"Well, there are the sugar frauds."

"Dear, me, yes. Everybody scared except those who got the money."

"And there's the tariff."

"Tariff! Seems to me I have heard that word before. Have we a tariff?"

"Oh, yes. Quite a considerable one."

"Wasn't it reduced shortly after you came in, in accordance with your promise?"

"Oh, certainly!"

"And that, I believe, accounts for the low prices of everything."

"Now, Life, I am glad that you mentioned that, as you have evidently the popular misconception that a tariff has anything to do with prices. I assure you it hasn't."

"And that is why, Mr. President, you felt that you could reduce it, in accordance with your promises beforehand? You are sure, by the way, that it has been reduced?"

"Oh, certainly. You see, it is this way: Gold is cheaper. All revenues must be paid in gold. Therefore revenues are cheaper."

"I hadn't thought of that."

"Perfectly plain, isn't it? Aldrich told me, so I know it must be so."

"You believe in Aldrich, don't you?"

"I swear by him."

"Good! And you are trying to please everybody, aren't you?"

"Certainly. That's what I am here for."

"Fine idea, Mr. President. Reminds me of the chameleon the little boy had."

"What was that?"

"Oh, only a foolish little story I once heard."

"Dear me. I am interested. What happened?"

"Why, little Willie's father brought him home
